

*General
Cutting & Cultivation
Services*

Largitzenstrasse 15

CH-4056 Basle

Switzerland

Telephone: +41 (61) 345 78 90

Telefax: +41 (61) 345 78 92

eMail: info@gccs.com

Professor Alfred B. Colquhoun
Tittlebat Research Centre
Isle of Skye
Scotland

Lausanne, le 15 septembre 2008

Dear Prof. Colquhoun,

Impressions of the journey from Vevey to Lausanne.

Cully, midway between Vevey and Lausanne, is a little town of 1,100 inhabitants. It can look back very far into the past, for there was a time when the lounge on the beach of Cully would have seen in the bay a lake village, an amphibious camp made up of thatched roofs and huts on a submerged field of piles. Later on the idler would have seen Roman legionaries and Roman merchants halting by the road, since Cully seems to have been a posting station or wayside caravanserai of some significance.

Cully, from its earliest days, has been devoted to the making of wine. It has probably made wine ever since wine-making was known in Europe. It makes wine still and makes it well and, indeed, does nothing else. Grapes and the winepress are the symbols of its being, the subject of its thoughts and the mark of its ambition. A bunch of grapes on a branch constitutes the ancient arms of Cully. They are grapes, it may be noticed, of such size and quality that they would seem to proclaim to the world, these are the grapes of Cully. Someone, inspired by a sense of the fitness of things, has surmised that there was once a temple to Bacchus at Cully, but unfortunately the suggestion is unfounded.

Yours Sincerely,

A. Nother

A. Nother
Head of Batology Dept.

cc: All Smiths in London
Mademoiselle S. Curchod
encl: Tourist guide to Switzerland.
Plan of Cully.

*General
Cutting & Cultivation
Services*

Largitzenstrasse 15

CH-4056 Basle

Switzerland

Telephone: +41 (61) 345 78 90

Telefax: +41 (61) 345 78 92

eMail: info@gccs.com

Mr. A. Miller
23a, Council Flats
Park Lane
London WC1

Lausanne, le 15 septembre 2008

Dear Archibald,

Impressions of the journey from Vevey to Lausanne.

Cully, midway between Vevey and Lausanne, is a little town of 1,100 inhabitants. It can look back very far into the past, for there was a time when the lounge on the beach of Cully would have seen in the bay a lake village, an amphibious camp made up of thatched roofs and huts on a submerged field of piles. Later on the idler would have seen Roman legionaries and Roman merchants halting by the road, since Cully seems to have been a posting station or wayside caravanserai of some significance.

Cully, from its earliest days, has been devoted to the making of wine. It has probably made wine ever since wine-making was known in Europe. It makes wine still and makes it well and, indeed, does nothing else. Grapes and the winepress are the symbols of its being, the subject of its thoughts and the mark of its ambition. A bunch of grapes on a branch constitutes the ancient arms of Cully. They are grapes, it may be noticed, of such size and quality that they would seem to proclaim to the world, these are the grapes of Cully. Someone, inspired by a sense of the fitness of things, has surmised that there was once a temple to Bacchus at Cully, but unfortunately the suggestion is unfounded.

Yours Sincerely,

A. Nother

A. Nother
Head of Batology Dept.

cc: All Smiths in London
Mademoiselle S. Curchod
encl: Tourist guide to Switzerland.
Plan of Cully.

*General
Cutting & Cultivation
Services*

Largitzenstrasse 15

CH-4056 Basle

Switzerland

Telephone: +41 (61) 345 78 90

Telefax: +41 (61) 345 78 92

eMail: info@gccs.com

Frau. Dr. V. Müller
Langassstrasse 115
3012 Bern

Lausanne, le 15 septembre 2008

Dear Vee,

Impressions of the journey from Vevey to Lausanne.

Cully, midway between Vevey and Lausanne, is a little town of 1,100 inhabitants. It can look back very far into the past, for there was a time when the lounge on the beach of Cully would have seen in the bay a lake village, an amphibious camp made up of thatched roofs and huts on a submerged field of piles. Later on the idler would have seen Roman legionaries and Roman merchants halting by the road, since Cully seems to have been a posting station or wayside caravanserai of some significance.

Cully, from its earliest days, has been devoted to the making of wine. It has probably made wine ever since wine-making was known in Europe. It makes wine still and makes it well and, indeed, does nothing else. Grapes and the winepress are the symbols of its being, the subject of its thoughts and the mark of its ambition. A bunch of grapes on a branch constitutes the ancient arms of Cully. They are grapes, it may be noticed, of such size and quality that they would seem to proclaim to the world, these are the grapes of Cully. Someone, inspired by a sense of the fitness of things, has surmised that there was once a temple to Bacchus at Cully, but unfortunately the suggestion is unfounded.

Yours Sincerely,

A. Nother

A. Nother
Head of Batology Dept.

cc: All Smiths in London
Mademoiselle S. Curchod
encl: Tourist guide to Switzerland.
Plan of Cully.

*General
Cutting & Cultivation
Services*

Largitzenstrasse 15

CH-4056 Basle

Switzerland

Telephone: +41 (61) 345 78 90

Telefax: +41 (61) 345 78 92

eMail: info@gccs.com

Herr Brusch
Kombing Weg
Glatze 30000

Lausanne, le 15 septembre 2008

Sali Brüschi,

Impressions of the journey from Vevey to Lausanne.

Cully, midway between Vevey and Lausanne, is a little town of 1,100 inhabitants. It can look back very far into the past, for there was a time when the lounge on the beach of Cully would have seen in the bay a lake village, an amphibious camp made up of thatched roofs and huts on a submerged field of piles. Later on the idler would have seen Roman legionaries and Roman merchants halting by the road, since Cully seems to have been a posting station or wayside caravanserai of some significance.

Cully, from its earliest days, has been devoted to the making of wine. It has probably made wine ever since wine-making was known in Europe. It makes wine still and makes it well and, indeed, does nothing else. Grapes and the winepress are the symbols of its being, the subject of its thoughts and the mark of its ambition. A bunch of grapes on a branch constitutes the ancient arms of Cully. They are grapes, it may be noticed, of such size and quality that they would seem to proclaim to the world, these are the grapes of Cully. Someone, inspired by a sense of the fitness of things, has surmised that there was once a temple to Bacchus at Cully, but unfortunately the suggestion is unfounded.

Yours Sincerely,

A. Nother

A. Nother
Head of Batology Dept.

cc: All Smiths in London

Mademoiselle S. Curchod

encl: Tourist guide to Switzerland.

Plan of Cully.

*General
Cutting & Cultivation
Services*

Largitzenstrasse 15

CH-4056 Basle

Switzerland

Telephone: +41 (61) 345 78 90

Telefax: +41 (61) 345 78 92

eMail: info@gccs.com

Viscountess Elizabeth Featherstonehaught-Cholmondeley
Cathedral Close
Winchester

Lausanne, le 15 septembre 2008

My Dearest Elizabeth,

Impressions of the journey from Vevey to Lausanne.

Cully, midway between Vevey and Lausanne, is a little town of 1,100 inhabitants. It can look back very far into the past, for there was a time when the lounge on the beach of Cully would have seen in the bay a lake village, an amphibious camp made up of thatched roofs and huts on a submerged field of piles. Later on the idler would have seen Roman legionaries and Roman merchants halting by the road, since Cully seems to have been a posting station or wayside caravanserai of some significance.

Cully, from its earliest days, has been devoted to the making of wine. It has probably made wine ever since wine-making was known in Europe. It makes wine still and makes it well and, indeed, does nothing else. Grapes and the winepress are the symbols of its being, the subject of its thoughts and the mark of its ambition. A bunch of grapes on a branch constitutes the ancient arms of Cully. They are grapes, it may be noticed, of such size and quality that they would seem to proclaim to the world, these are the grapes of Cully. Someone, inspired by a sense of the fitness of things, has surmised that there was once a temple to Bacchus at Cully, but unfortunately the suggestion is unfounded.

Yours Sincerely,

A. Nother

A. Nother
Head of Batology Dept.

cc: All Smiths in London
Mademoiselle S. Curchod
encl: Tourist guide to Switzerland.
Plan of Cully.

*General
Cutting & Cultivation
Services*

Largitzenstrasse 15

CH-4056 Basle

Switzerland

Telephone: +41 (61) 345 78 90

Telefax: +41 (61) 345 78 92

eMail: info@gccs.com

Sir Archibald Bloggs
Jones Old Yard
Gasworks Lane
Throgmortendale

Lausanne, le 15 septembre 2008

Howdy Sir Archie,

Impressions of the journey from Vevey to Lausanne.

Cully, midway between Vevey and Lausanne, is a little town of 1,100 inhabitants. It can look back very far into the past, for there was a time when the lounge on the beach of Cully would have seen in the bay a lake village, an amphibious camp made up of thatched roofs and huts on a submerged field of piles. Later on the idler would have seen Roman legionaries and Roman merchants halting by the road, since Cully seems to have been a posting station or wayside caravanserai of some significance.

Cully, from its earliest days, has been devoted to the making of wine. It has probably made wine ever since wine-making was known in Europe. It makes wine still and makes it well and, indeed, does nothing else. Grapes and the winepress are the symbols of its being, the subject of its thoughts and the mark of its ambition. A bunch of grapes on a branch constitutes the ancient arms of Cully. They are grapes, it may be noticed, of such size and quality that they would seem to proclaim to the world, these are the grapes of Cully. Someone, inspired by a sense of the fitness of things, has surmised that there was once a temple to Bacchus at Cully, but unfortunately the suggestion is unfounded.

Yours Sincerely,

A. Nother

A. Nother
Head of Batology Dept.

cc: All Smiths in London
Mademoiselle S. Curchod
encl: Tourist guide to Switzerland.
Plan of Cully.

*General
Cutting & Cultivation
Services*

Largitzenstrasse 15

CH-4056 Basle

Switzerland

Telephone: +41 (61) 345 78 90

Telefax: +41 (61) 345 78 92

eMail: info@gccs.com

Frau B. Bossie
Cookbook Corner
Hamble le Rice
Hampshire

Lausanne, le 15 septembre 2008

Dear Bossy Betty,

Impressions of the journey from Vevey to Lausanne.

Cully, midway between Vevey and Lausanne, is a little town of 1,100 inhabitants. It can look back very far into the past, for there was a time when the lounge on the beach of Cully would have seen in the bay a lake village, an amphibious camp made up of thatched roofs and huts on a submerged field of piles. Later on the idler would have seen Roman legionaries and Roman merchants halting by the road, since Cully seems to have been a posting station or wayside caravanserai of some significance.

Cully, from its earliest days, has been devoted to the making of wine. It has probably made wine ever since wine-making was known in Europe. It makes wine still and makes it well and, indeed, does nothing else. Grapes and the winepress are the symbols of its being, the subject of its thoughts and the mark of its ambition. A bunch of grapes on a branch constitutes the ancient arms of Cully. They are grapes, it may be noticed, of such size and quality that they would seem to proclaim to the world, these are the grapes of Cully. Someone, inspired by a sense of the fitness of things, has surmised that there was once a temple to Bacchus at Cully, but unfortunately the suggestion is unfounded.

Yours Sincerely,

A. Nother

A. Nother
Head of Batology Dept.

cc: All Smiths in London
Mademoiselle S. Curchod
encl: Tourist guide to Switzerland.
Plan of Cully.

*General
Cutting & Cultivation
Services*

Largitzenstrasse 15

CH-4056 Basle

Switzerland

Telephone: +41 (61) 345 78 90

Telefax: +41 (61) 345 78 92

eMail: info@gccs.com

Mr. James Cowper,
Chief Gardener,
The Rose Bush,
Pearl Cottage,
147, Wild Rose Lane,
High Street,
Little Muddleton.
Nr. Greater Muddelton.
Yorkshire.
England.

Lausanne, le 15 septembre 2008

Hello Jimmie boy,

Impressions of the journey from Vevey to Lausanne.

Cully, midway between Vevey and Lausanne, is a little town of 1,100 inhabitants. It can look back very far into the past, for there was a time when the lounge on the beach of Cully would have seen in the bay a lake village, an amphibious camp made up of thatched roofs and huts on a submerged field of piles. Later on the idler would have seen Roman legionaries and Roman merchants halting by the road, since Cully seems to have been a posting station or wayside caravanserai of some significance.

Cully, from its earliest days, has been devoted to the making of wine. It has probably made wine ever since wine-making was known in Europe. It makes wine still and makes it well and, indeed, does nothing else. Grapes and the winepress are the symbols of its being, the subject of its thoughts and the mark of its ambition. A bunch of grapes on a branch constitutes the ancient arms of Cully. They are grapes, it may be noticed, of such size and quality that they would seem to proclaim to the world, these are the grapes of Cully. Someone, inspired by a sense of the fitness of things, has surmised that there was once a temple to Bacchus at Cully, but unfortunately the suggestion is unfounded.

Yours Sincerely,

A. Nother

A. Nother
Head of Batology Dept.

cc: All Smiths in London

Mademoiselle S. Curchod

encl: Tourist guide to Switzerland.

Plan of Cully.